That Is Certain

Reports from Washington, D. C. reveal that thousands of people are coming off the public payroll. With all due consideration and sympathy for the individuals involved, we must view that situation with a great deal of encouragement. Economy in government is a prerequisite to balancing the budget and lower taxes.

Even the most ardent partisans must admit that too many people have been supported by taxes.

The present administration pledged itself to economy and efficiency and there are definite indications that an effort will be made to balance the budget and ease the burden on taxpayers.

It is hoped that good sound judgment will be the basis for weeding out people from the government payrolls. Certainly we do not want to curtail the effectiveness of public agencies which are necessary to perform essential services which rightfully belong to government.

People everywhere pay lip service to cutting government spending, but unfortunately a lot of people oppose the cutting of government spending if the cut affects them. Already we are seeing opposition in many directions to programs of economy just because those programs of economy affect certain individuals or their localities.

In numerous cases plans are in the making to try to get cuts restored, not because the cuts were not justifiable but because they affected certain people or sections.

Those who have the responsibility of executing a program of economy and efficiency will have to be willing to stand up against selfish political pressure. President Eisenhower has given indications that he possesses the proper type of courage. A good many of his Lieutenants have indicated that they are likewise fortified with such integrity, honesty and definiteness of purpose that they will not be pressured from their course by selfish political activity.

The effects of this program if it is permitted to continue will be beneficially felt by all people in this country. Relief from unnecessary tax pressure can be more readily accomplished if the administration can receive the support of the average citizens.

Taxes are affected by spending. Unless government spending is cut we cannot expect tax relief. That is certain.

Pythian Echoes

by R. Cole Lee

Sunday is Mother's Day. Suppose we parallel her precious life or her sacred memory with all else of earth. I am sure your other gifts will seem so very small. Suppose we start in this manner: You have heard the voice that lays great stress on what is deeply felt—heard voices in a chorus of celestial melody. You have listened to countless voices in all the moods of human emotion, but the sweetest, dearest voice you ever heard was the voice of your MOTHER.

You have seen the smiles of languishing young love—seen the smiles of infants, but you will never in all your life see a smile so sweet and sincere as the smile of your MOTHER.

You have heard a great anthem portraying the power of patriotism in song — heard songs that seemed to dip their wings in the tears of sentiment. You have heard songs that will outlive sermons—beautiful ballads — songs in the hall of joy, but no song has ever reached your soul like the favorite song of your MOTHER.

You have seen the dear deceit of some pretty plaything—seen the numberless flowers of spring unfold their dew-kissed beauty to early morn: You have seen beauty chiselled from marble and beauty wrought out on canvass. You have seen all the charming things of life, but nothing to you has been half so beautiful as the time-worn features of your MOTHER.

You have heard the fugitive gems of forgotten poets spoken by some gifted tongue. You have heard the sayings of great philosophers who have received the larger recognition. You have read the enduring words of saints and the speeches of distinguished statesmen, but no words in all language will ever be so near and so dear to you as the words of your MOTHER.

You have heard the devout prayers in many tongues and from many rituals. You have heard the petitions of the pious—the supplications of the peasant and the revival prayers darting to the Divine. You have heard the emergency prayers of the frightened, but no prayer that you have ever heard has so reached your understanding heart as that prayer of your MOTHER.

If your mother is near I would suggest that you carry the tribute in your own hands or in your heart—take the tribute to her and take it now.

Time has scattered the snowy flakes on her brow, plowed deep furrows on her cheek but still she remains beautiful because she is your MOTHER. Time has made her lips thin, these lips which have kissed many a hot tear from your cheek, but these lips are just as caressing now because they are the lips of your MOTHER.

Although the sands of life are fast running low and feeble are her steps, still your MOTHER will reach out further and go the extreme limit for you than anyone else of your acquaintance. When despised and forsaken, when treated so unkindly and spoken to discourteously, it is your MOTHER that will take you in her arms and reveal to you all your virtues. Love her dearly and cheer her continually and thus make her declining years sweet with memories of a devoted son or daughter.

DOGS by Tom Farley

Bathing the Dog

One of the most common misconceptions about dog care is the outmoded belief that the canine has to be bathed at least once or twice a month to stay clean and in good health.

The idea probably evolved as man's own toilet habits developed to their present state. Unless the dog were bathed that frequently, his master may have reasoned, he would fall prey to that unmentionable something "which even his best friends won't tell him about."

In this case, however, what is sauce for the goose is no good for the gander. In other words, Fido shouldn't be bathed once or twice a month. At the most he should be subjected to soap and water three or four times a year.

Why? For one thing, a dog's skin does not contain sweat glands. It does have many grease glands which secrete an oily substance that tends to protect the coat and keep the skin soft and pliable. Too frequent bathing washes away this natural oil and dries out the coat and skin. This in turn can cause tiny cracks to appear and if they become infected, as so often happens, the coat may be severely damaged.

It's not necessary to bathe a dog to remove dirt and grime. Usually it will be found that the dirt is near the surface and if the coat is parted, the skin underneath will be quite clean. A vigorous rubbing with a damp cloth followed by brushing and combing will normally put his coat right back in condition.

When you do bathe your dog be careful of the type of soap used. A good laundry soap with a low alkali content is best. Water temperature should be slightly above 100 degrees Fahrenheit or comfortably warm to your hand. Soap the dog well and then rinse him thoroughly, first with warm and then with tepid or almost cold water. Rinsing is the most important part of the operation because if any soap is left in the coat, it will become sticky and quickly collect dirt.

Dry the dog by rubbing him briskly with a hand towel and then give him a hand massage and a thorough brushing. If the weather is not cold encourage him to run outdoors.

The danger of a dog catching cold from a bath is practically nonexistent mainly because of the fact that his skin doesn't contain sweat glands. The occasional sneezing which may occur after washing is usually due to nasal irritation from the soap and doesn't mean that the pooch should be put to bed with your favorite toddy.

FREEDOM NEEDS NO SECURITY

Every Workman Is A Miniature Corporation

What it costs you to just get by—enough to keep body and soul together—is what corporations call the "break-even point." Whatever you earn above that is "profit" you can use as you like—for savings, a car, a better home.

It's the same with a company—what they earn above the "break-even point" they spend for better equipment, or save for carrying them through depressions, or invest in new products. (Only a small part goes to the investor, who made the company possible.)

Since 1929, the "profit" of the average American—the excess over necessities—has increased 302.7%; the profit of the average American corporation has increased 134.5%. Worth remembering, when the soap-box orators scream about "excessive profits." When will they begin objecting to yours?

Health For All

Life Sentence

Not so long ago, when the doctor said, "It's tuberculosis," he was in effect pronouncing a sentence of death. Today, because of great advances in chemotherapy and surgery, recovery from tuberculosis is becoming more and more the rule. But the words, "It's TB," are still a shock.

It is not easy for anyone to face the fact that he has a serious, chronic disease, that he will likely have to endure the strangeness and tedium of a long hospital stay, separated from family and friends. Yet the best medical results depend on his facing the facts, on his full understanding that the TB hospital is a place of opportunity, not just a prison where he will be isolated for the protection of others.

The patient who refuses to go to the hospital when advised to do so or who leaves against medical advice is likely to lose his battle with tuberculosis. Death or a real life sentence of dependent invalidism may be the result. The restless, unhappy patient has the poorest chance for a quick recovery. In the TB hospital there is definitely "time off for good behavior."

The family is of primary importance in the patient's fight back to health. By confident acceptance of the fact that he must stay in the hospital until the cure is complete, the family can help him see it through. They can keep him up to date on family news and include him in family conferences on matters which will not needlessly upset him. Community agencies stand ready to help with the distressing financial and domestic problems illness in the family so often brings. The patient should be able to look forward cheerfully to his return home, to a useful, healthy, and happy life.

Little Talks with Big Thoughts

All races, all nations have been born in travail. Grown in sorrow, bloodshed and valor. Down thru the centuries, they have passed on their strength. Now we, as a melting pot of all races and nations, have inherited these strengths. The greatest of which is integrity.

It has kept races alive and unconquered under conquerors. Has given rebirth to nations. It is a rare and valuable gift which cannot be taken for granted. For loss of the integrity of its individuals will overthrow a country more quickly than any enemy attack.

Boros Says Golf Tour Is Toughest Grind

Julius Boros, the United States Open champion, who will play against the American public on National Golf Day, Saturday, May 23, is one of the most refreshing and forthright sports figures to emerge in years. Boros says flatly:

"I never played too much competitive golf. I used to work for a living."

But in the four years that he has been a professional he has already managed to win the Open at Dallas and the Tam O'Shanter "world championship" event in Chicago, and to become the Golfer of the Year, as well as the foremost money winner of 1952.

"I have been playing competitively only eight years," declares the 33-year-old, 200-pound Fairfield, Connecticut, stylist who now represents the Mid Pines Club of Southern Pines, North Carolina.

"And honestly," he adds, "I never thought that I would ever be a professional golfer. In the case of baseball, a boy might want to be a Joe DiMaggio or a Babe Ruth because he reads about it all the time and it is played all around him. The last thing that I ever imagined was that I would be the open golf champion. Well, in Dallas, I was just consistent — that was all. Had four good rounds."

Boros, innately modest, shot magnificently enough to spot Ben Hogan four strokes at the end of thirty-six holes, then to overhaul him with a scintillating 68 and 71 in the Dallas heat. Boros outscored Hogan by five strokes at the end.

He doesn't underestimate Hogan in the least, however.

"Hogan and Snead—they had it all the time. They were the men to beat all the time, and still are."

To the easy-going Boros, the mastery of golf breaks down to "just a matter of timing and of pacing yourself."

"If you can play only once a week, just enjoy it," he advises, and don't get yourself in a stew over it."

When Boros is off his game, he maintains a fairly stolid philosophy concerning the situation. After a dismal round in the best-ball event at the Seminole Club in West Palm Beach recently, Julius did not go into a decline. Instead, he and a pal "just went fishing."

"It's a peculiar thing about that tournament stint," says the open champion, "it's the toughest grind in sports. It can break your heart and your pocketbook. Not everybody can make money on the tour —but everybody has a lot of fun."

Boros points out how many unsuccessful itinerant playing pros will quit the tournaments, where it costs them about $200 a week to live on the road, and take jobs of any nature at home. They will raise a kitty, then return to the fray hoping to hit the jackpot. Julius himself is a case in point of how the wheel of golfing fortune can turn. Down in the ruck early in 1952, he won $4,000 in the Open and $25,000 in the Tam O'Shanter. Testimonials and other monetary tidbits have since rolled in.

Boros himself believes that his wood play is the best feature of his game. He thinks that the best shot he ever registered was at Merion in Philadelphia when Hogan won a few years ago. At the 16th hole, Julius drove into a trap, right off the fairway. With a no. 4 wood, Boros smashed the ball to the green. This was the famous quarry hole, with about 150 yards of jungle to the green. If the ball had landed short, he would have been lucky to find it, let alone play it.

"I've always been a hot and cold putter," confesses Boros, "bad one day and good the next. I still am that way."

He still is a remarkably fine golfer who is thrilled at the thought of playing on National Golf Day, May 23. Boros' score over the Oakmont Country Club course, where the Open will take place later on, will be matched against that of American golfers all over the land. Each golfer, using his local or Callaway handicap, pays $1.00 to enter the National Golf Day test, with every cent going towards worthy causes. Last year more than $80,000 was realized for the U.S.O. and National Golf Fund, Inc., in the competition sponsored jointly by the P.G.A. and Life Magazine.

"After National Golf Day," says Boros, "the big event for me will be the Open. I believe that Lloyd Mangrum, Hogan and Snead will be the threats. The long course should be right for Snead. Watch him."

Many people will be watching Julius Boros also. He has an inspirational tendency to win the big ones.
